

A UNIX timestamp is a numerical value representing the number of seconds that have elapsed since January 1, 1970, 00:00:00 UTC, used for time-keeping in Unix-based systems and programming.
In Python, a URL (Uniform Resource Locator) is a web address that specifies the location of a resource on the internet, typically consisting of a protocol, domain, and path.
The "urllib" library in Python is used for working with URLs and making HTTP requests, including functions for fetching web content, handling cookies, and more.
Web services in Python are software components that allow applications to communicate over the internet by sending and receiving data in a standardized format, typically using protocols like HTTP or XML.
Web scraping in Python is the process of extracting data from websites by parsing and analyzing their HTML structure, often done with libraries like BeautifulSoup or Scrapy.
An XLSX file is a file format used for storing spreadsheet data in Excel, containing worksheets, cells, and formulas in a structured manner.
XML (Extensible Markup Language) is a text-based format for storing and structuring data using tags, often used for data interchange and configuration files.